This appears even from the contrast which is made between nimum and parum; for instance, Cic. Orat. 1, 22. Etsi suus cuique modus est, tamen magis offendit nimum quam parum. So, also, it stands with a degree of modesty for non; but the fundamental idea is still perceptible; thus, Horat. Parum castis lucis, h. e. impure, unholy. Sueton. Consilio non concios parum celato. It can indeed be sometimes rendered by little, but this is not the whole of its meaning (at least in classical Latin). Sallust. however, in Jug. 85, 31. seems to have used parum to signify little. — II. Nepos. Nemo illo fuit minus emax, less fond of buying than he. Apul. Minimo minus interii, almost, within or to a hair. — Quam is often wanting, and without any thing to take its place; this takes place especially in the statement of a number, in which case it may commonly be also rendered under. Liv. Haud minus duo millia, not less than, not under. Cic. Minus triginta diebus, in less than thirty days. Liv. Ne dona minus quinum millium (daret), no presents of less than (h. e. under) five thousand asses. — It is also joined with an abl. in answer to the question, how much less? Varr. Si assecutus sum, gaudeo: sin minus, hoc me tamen consolator, h. e. but if not. — ¶ Also, too little; without or (usually) with plus (which is then too much). Cic. dicere. Terent. Plus minusve faxit, too much or too little. But in both these places it may be the adj. — III. MINIME, least. Cic. So, Id. PRÆTĒR (for prætor, from præco), oris, m. properly, any leader, chief, head, president. Hence, the consul, as the chief magistrate, was formerly called prætor maximus. Liv. 7, 3. Also, simply, prætor. Liv. 3, 55. — Tacit. ararii, h. e. president. — Particularly, a general, commander, στρατηγός. It is rarely applied to Roman generals, but very frequently to those of foreign nations, as, of the Athenians. Cic. and Nepos. Of the Thebans. Cic. — In civil life, a chief, director, head, superintendent. Tacit. ararii. (See above.) The chief magistrate in Capua was called so, according to Cic. Agr. 2, 34; with us, the mayor. So, also, at Carthage. Nep. Hann. 7. In this passage, it is a civil magistrate. — Prætor is particularly a magistrate at Rome, who administered justice, and ranked next to the consuls. Cic. There were eight prætors at Rome in the time of Cicero. Of these, two were employed in cansis privatis, h. e. private disputes concerning property. One of them was called prætor urbanus, who administered justice when the two parties were cives, h. e. possessed Roman citizenship. The other was called prætor peregrinus, who administered justice when both parties at variance, or only one of them, were peregrini, h. e. had not the right of Roman citizenship. The other six prætors were concerned with causæ publicæ, as murder, adultery, ambitus, &c. These eight prætors committed the examination of causes to subordinate judges, who were called judices selecti, and published the sentence of these judges, who formerly gave their votes viva voce, but afterwards on tablets. The prætors wore a toga prætexta, sat in sella curules, and were preceded by six lictors. Their office lasted a year. They afterwards went, as governors, into a province assigned to them by lot, in which there was no army. There they administered justice, performed the duties of the eight prætors at Rome, and were called propretiores: though such a governor was frequently, also, called prætor. Cic. Verr. 2, 4, and 60, 4, 25, &c. The administration of all prætors, both at Rome and in the provinces, consisted in two things, viz. in edicto and decretis ex edicto. (See Jurisdicatio.) — The office of prætor was first instituted at Rome, A. U. C. 388, partly because the consuls, on account of the many wars in which they commanded, could no longer administer justice; partly, that thereby the patricians might have a compensation for sharing the consulate with the people (plebs, the ignoble). — At first, there was only one prætor. Sulla made their number six; Cæsar, eight; Augustus made sixteen. — Cic. ad Div. 2, 17, 12. Prætor, for proconsul. — Cic. Prætor primus, h. e. who was first elected. By this some understand the prætor urbanus.
